

Where there's a will there's a way

IF you have not made a will, your estate may not go to the beneficiaries you intend it to.

When considering inheritance tax planning, the will is the most important tool.

Research shows 57 per cent of the UK population does not have a will.

At minimum, if you have children, a will should be made to establish guardianship and financial provision for your children in the event of the death of all/both adults with established parental responsibility.

These are important decisions for you and your family.

The best way of ensuring your wishes are followed is by making a will.

Planning allows for the most efficient use of exemptions and reliefs and for use of gifts over time to manage the size of estates and inheritance tax bills.

Without a will in place alongside robust planning, many reliefs will be lost.

Act now for tomorrow brings the unknown.
